

Abstract:

There is a continuing debate on the structure and function of the cortex. While many models and theories exist, there is an increasing number of indications that the model of the layered, compartmental brain does not account for its function. We look into autoencoder-based recurrent latent-variable models as a possible new way of understanding the brain, and debate parallels between systems theory and cortical function.